Groundcover News, a 501(c)(3) organization, was founded in April 2010 as a means to empower low-income persons to make the transitions from homeless to housed, and from jobless to employed.

Vendors purchase each biweekly copy of Groundcover News at our office for 50 cents. This money goes towards production costs. Vendors work selling the paper on the street for $2, keeping all income and tips from each sale.

Street papers like Groundcover News exist in cities all over the United States, as well as in more than 40 other countries, in an effort to raise awareness of the plight of homeless people and combat the increase in poverty. We are proudly a member of the International Network of Street Papers.

As Russia invades Ukraine, it's anticipated that more than a million people may flee the country to seek refuge in neighbouring nations like Poland, Czech Republic, Hungary and Slovakia. Street papers in those places respond to the ongoing conflict, standing in solidarity with the Ukrainian people's right to democracy and in support of all those who may flee. Spring Equinox

As the days get longer in the northern hemisphere, we will arrive at the moment when day and night are the same length of time. It's called a vernal equinox and happens twice a year. The sun is directly above the equator.

March 20 will be the vernal equinox that is called spring in the northern hemisphere and fall in the southern hemisphere. It is the tilt of the earth that brings us the seasons. Every change of seasons is a community celebration as we recognize the vastness of the commons we share.

Common sense has become even more precious due to its scarcity under the onslaught of commodity fetish culture and the drive to extract profit until the last resources are exhausted. The target now is your data, time and attention. The complexity of this is compounded by the puzzle of appearances so that common sense can easily become a fiction of the prevailing cognitive bias.

If only common sense and scientific method became commonly understood. Can our observations be studied with some consensus around a hypothesis that we can test experimentally? Our life is an experiment and our challenge is to come up with a working hypothesis and put it to the test. The struggle is to experience our own consciousness, mindfulness, awareness and concentrate them into a completeness that will be fresh in this moment, and find reality to be a workable situation. That is my community. We can talk about reparations and unceded land, towards a reconciliation that benefits all beings without exception. Ecovillages will welcome you everywhere.

Where Do We Go From Here? Martin Luther King wrote a book with that title. He was spiritual friends with Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Buddhist monk who was a master of inner peace, learning to be fully present in this moment. Their respect was so deep that King nominated him for the Nobel Peace Prize in 1967. They were both controversial in the media at that time and no Peace Prize was awarded that year. You can go into communion with them when you are ready. Thich Nhat Hanh died in January this year at the age of 95. His funeral was widely viewed and moved a world audience to experience some moments of inner peace. His teaching and experience continue at plumvillage.org. As is taught, "When the student is ready the teacher will appear."

The spring equinox is another opportunity to celebrate the commons and experience what we share more deeply. We share the air and can practice breathing communion by placing our attention on the breath and resting at ease in the natural state of contentment. It may take some patience and be short-lived because we are not familiar with it as a way of life. It takes practice and every little bit counts.

Are there Black Republicans anymore?

will win his race for the U.S. House of Representatives as a Black Republican in the 2022 election.

Regardless of the election results, it is clear that being a Black Republican is less of an anomaly as it advances towards being the norm. The Newsweek article predicts that the 2022 elections "... could go down as the moment elected Black Republicans go from a rarity to a real contingent."

The Democrats' long-held claim on diversity is being challenged by these Black Republican candidates and it calls into question what one Black Republican House member refers to as a Democratic "monopoly on Black folks."

Once considered the party of white men, the GOP, according to an anonymous Republican white official quoted in Newsweek, "can't be the party of white men anymore." Given that insight, the new diversity of the Grand Old Party as it relates to race may be the biggest and newest challenge to Democrats at the 2022 polls.

Is family sheltering failing Washtenaw County?

WASHTENAW CAMP OUTREACH

Anna* began experiencing homelessness in January 2018. After nearly two years of sleeping outside, while working and trying to survive on the street with PTSD, in December 2019 she became pregnant and was moved up to the fourth floor at the Delonis Shelter — a higher-priority, more secure bed space. That stability only lasted until March 2020, the start of the COVID-19 pandemic. "I was kicked out, pregnant, with nothing but the hope I would be eligible for Rapid-Rehousing," she said.

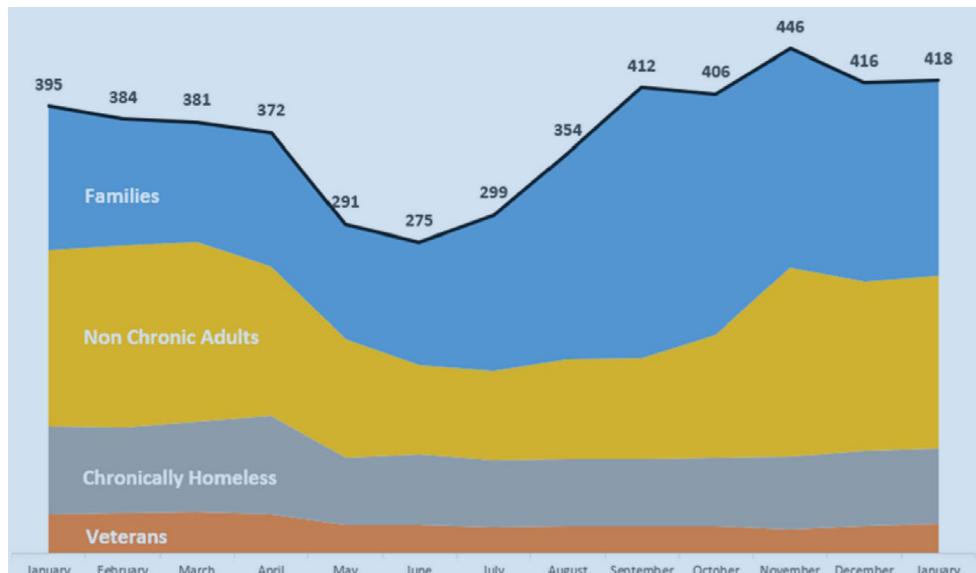

Anna then moved in with her child's grandmother, which disqualified her from the 'homeless' status, and consequently from her eligibility to receive high priority housing assistance. As soon as the eviction moratorium was lifted in 2021, she and her daughter were evicted from the grandmother's because of a Section 8 stipulation that restricts 'doubling up' in Housing Choice Voucher units.

In the summer of 2021, shelter provider Staples Family Center greatly reduced their capacity due to unknown reasons that were not shared with the community, devoting space at the center to veterans instead. In an August Groundcover article covering the Staples Family Center's bed reduction, Marla Conklin, director of social services at the Salvation Army, claimed that family sheltering needs would be covered "through eviction diversion and the use of hotel vouchers."

Eight months later and in the depths of winter, it is apparent that family homelessness is rising (see right graphic) and that families continue to fall through critical gaps in the social services safety net.

We visited the Staples Family Center after trying to reach out on their phone and checking their website. Nothing public-facing indicates the change in services that occurred in August. They were not able to be contacted for an interview.

Nearly all housing services in Master of Social Work intern Dara Bellinson said, "The two values I want to highlight are people and quality. We say people rather than community because we understand each person we serve has individual needs; however, community is also very important to us ... The food we serve is whole and nutritious. Our goal is to be 75% locally sourced by 2025." So far, FedUp partners with three local gardens. FedUp takes into account allergies and food preferences, supplying vegan, vegetarian and gluten-free options.

FedUp predominantly caters to people experiencing homelessness, poverty and food insecurity. Pastor Anna, Executive Director of FedUp, has commented that there is a hierarchy of needs and as a church initiative, FedUp is focused on the spiritual needs of people. But they recognize they can't offer hope to people who don't know where their next meal is coming from. So, they conclude, they can't nourish the spirit without nourishing the mind and body.

The organization lives out its values of people, service, dignity and quality.

FedUp provides meals at community events, listens to community panels, and collects feedback from regulars. Over the past year, FedUp has served more than 4,000 meals with the help of its 20 partners, and continues to feed the unhoused community and partner organizations at least six times a week. In the future, FedUp plans to hire people directly from the community they serve to work in the kitchen; expand its partnerships to include more businesses and civic organizations that align with its mission; and secure laundry and shower trucks.

Consider donating to FedUp to support the team in achieving these goals and, most importantly, expanding their reach to those in need of these necessary, life-sustaining services and resources. Other options to support FedUp include signing up for its newsletter, booking the food truck, having FedUp cater an event, becoming a financial partner, volunteering and/or praying with and for FedUp.

Anyone, no proof of requirements necessary, can pick up a meal from FedUp. FedUp's Google Calendar, on its official website, contains information on FedUp events. If community members face urgent need, and FedUp is not hosting events in their area, they can contact FedUp on fedupministries.org's contact form, located on its homepage, to be connected with resources.

Ice fishing: not your grandfather's sport

As someone who grew up ice fishing, I've grown accustomed to being met with laughter and puzzled faces when I tell them that ice fishing can be exciting. They'll say: "You freeze your butt off and twitch a lure in a tiny hole for hours and call that fun?" The answer is more complicated than that.

For a self-proclaimed "die-hard" like me, I would say yes. But, having had a great deal of experience bringing my less outdoor-oriented friends and people with small attention spans on the hardwater, I've seen that there are ways to promote everyone having a good time. Technological advancements combined with a better understanding of fish behavior have turned the sport from a guessing game characterized by inactivity into an exciting, fulfilling activity.

Companies like Garmin now make fish finders that use sonar technology to monitor fish activity and translate it to a screen that the angler can watch. So unless you're being guided by an old-timer who knows all the best spots, modern ice fishing can be equated to a real-life video game on a sonar screen where a victory leads to triumph over mother nature and an Instagram-worthy creature pulled through the hole. Before these advances, it was a complete mystery as to what could be swimming below.

This led to much intrigue, but also hours of wasted time fishing what we can now recognize as unproductive spots.

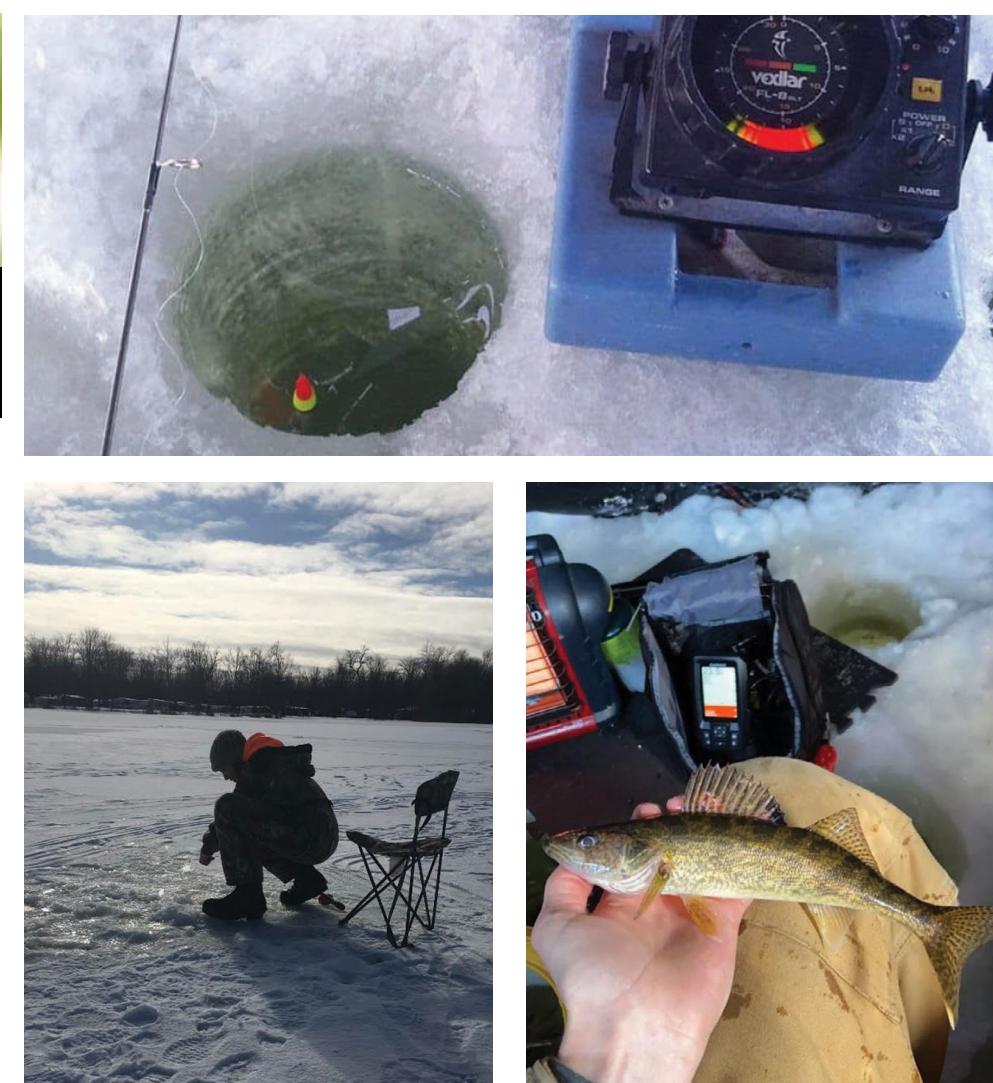

My fondest memory on the ice came at an early age. My father and I were camping on a small lake in the Upper Peninsula catching hand-sized bluegills and sunfish as fast as we could drop our lines in the water. We were about to catch our daily limit when I set the hook on another small fish. As I was coaxing it in, the rod jerked out of my hands, and when I went to pick it up, it felt like a sea monster had latched on. After about a ten-minute tug-of-war, my dad grabbed ahold of a Master Angler (38 in.) Northern Pike. I cherish memories like those with my father over almost anything, and that child-like bliss that comes with catching a fish never seems to fade away.

Ice fishing at its simplest looks something like this: You grab some of your hardest friends, pack up your vehicle with ice rods, lures and snacks, get your shack to shelter you from the elements, and bring an ice auger to drill holes for fishing through the ice.

From the comfort of a shack with a warm heater, anglers can take their

26th Annual Exhibition of Art by Michigan Prisoners back in person

SARAH UNRATH
Groundcover contributor

The Prison Creative Arts Project presents the "26th Annual Exhibition of Art by Michigan Prisoners," the largest exhibition in the world of its kind.

The free, public exhibition, which opens at 5 p.m. on March 22, highlights the work of 392 artists from 26 state correctional facilities in Michigan. It features 714 paintings, drawings and three-dimensional works.

After almost two years of not being able to meet the artists in person, PCAP staff and volunteers had strong reactions to reconnecting with them. "There was no greater joy I experienced this year than visiting artists in prison. Despite everything, PCAP artists have persevered and they continue to create works of great ingenuity, nuance, thoughtfulness and playfulness. I'm humbled by it," PCAP Director Nora Kritinsky stated.

Art selection trips to each facility are at the heart of the exhibition because this is when powerful dialog happens between artists and volunteers. "I learned a great deal about what inspires their work, such as their family, passions outside of art, and the goals that they have set for themselves in the future," MSW graduate Emily Cole shared as she reflected on her experience.

The show features a diversity of both artists and artistic choices. Artists range in age from 18 to 80, men and women from across the state with diverse racial, ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds. Most pieces are offered for sale, with proceeds going directly to the artists. Last year, almost half of the 823 pieces were sold, generating $28,945 in just two weeks.

There is a broad array of artistic media and subject matter, including landscapes, portraits, prison scenes and political statements.

"Many artists chose to respond visually to many of the same topics that currently dominate the news and public discourse, including emotional and thoughtful reflections on isolation and COVID-19, on the American political landscape, and personal perspectives on race and the Black Lives Matter movement," curator Charlie Michaels observed.

The exhibition is supported by the Michigan Council for Arts and Cultural Affairs, U-M Residential College, U-M College of Literature, Science and the Arts, and Om of Medicine-Ann Arbor.

The opening celebration program begins at 6:30 p.m. on March 22nd and features speakers from the University, the Michigan Department of Corrections and artists from previous exhibitions, and a performance by the U-M Out of the Blue choir.

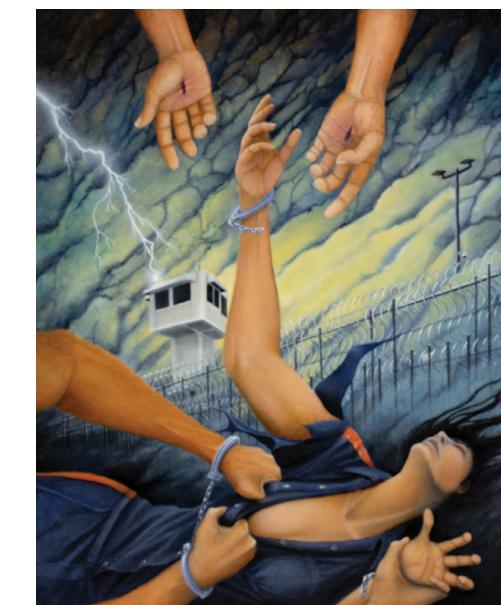

The exhibition is supported by the

Community group proposes non-police crisis response team

MARLEY HORNEWER
Ann Arbor Community Safety Coalition

On April 5, 2021, the Ann Arbor City Council passed Resolution 21-0612. This resolution directed the City Administrator, John Fournier, to create a new public safety program to respond to mental health crises — for example, suicide threats — across Ann Arbor. The resolution specified that the response team's workers should be unarmed, because "the presence of a holstered firearm may give rise to feelings of unease and intimidation, particularly among persons from BIPOC communities."

Excited by the City's efforts to promote public safety, a coalition of community members came together to offer input on the new program. They called themselves CROS (pronounced "crows"), which stands for Coalition for Re-envisioning Our Safety — and their efforts are ongoing today. Among CROS' members are faith leaders, social workers/therapists, public health and healthcare workers, researchers, community builders and racial justice organizers.

CROS' intention is clear: they want to ensure that the new public safety program is community-led and evidence-based. In particular, they want to ensure that the program takes into account the diverse interests of the community members it will serve and the increasing evidence that care-based — rather than violence-based — safety is the most effective way to protect communities, particularly over the long-term. Collectively, CROS members have articulated a shared analysis of public safety and crafted a proposal for the new unarmed response program.

Central to CROS' shared analysis are these seven tenets:

1. There are expert non-police professionals who should be responding to certain types of emergencies, such as mental health crises.

2. "Public safety" means caring for the well-being of ALL people — no exceptions.

3. Police can cause significant harm to communities, even if individual police officers mean well.

4. Community members should inform and direct how their community responds to danger, and therefore should inform and direct the unarmed, non-police response to mental health crises.

5. The word "violence" describes harms perpetuated on various levels, including the systemic level (such as hunger and homelessness) and the interpersonal level (such as emotional abuse between two individuals).

6. The expert non-police professionals who respond to crises must be independent from the criminal legal system, so as to avoid further entangling community members in cycles of incarceration.

7. Police, who were trained to address crises using violence, cannot be effectively re-trained to address crises using care-based methods.

Based on this shared analysis, and drawing from existing model programs across the country (including those in Eugene, Denver, Olympia, San Francisco, and Austin), CROS members have proposed that Ann Arbor's new public safety program should include these six features:

1. Be politically supported and funded by the City government, but housed and managed within a separate organization or group whose mission aligns with the work.

2. Follow a public health approach by ensuring separation from law enforcement and the legal system (no law enforcement included in response) as well as by expanding beyond solely mental health to issues of conflict, public assistance, transportation and more.

3. Use a separate phone number, independent from 911, to give people who would avoid a 911 law enforcement response a place to call for help.

4. A 2-year (minimum) funded pilot of the program that allows for quality design, implementation and evaluation.

5. Select service providers through a process that is open and informed by community members and experts.

6. Include direction and decisions from a governing board composed of community members and leaders.

CROS members explain that their proposed program model is promising because it provides a comprehensive mechanism to connect the right resources to the right needs — for example, to connect a houseless person with shelter, food, water and health care, and to bring in trained, unarmed, trauma-informed de-escalators to settle interpersonal conflicts. As an added benefit, their proposed model won't overtax or incorrectly use the Ann Arbor police department; instead, the program will make use of skilled community members like social workers — people who already know how to do this sort of crisis response work, and how to do so effectively.

CROS estimates that their proposed model's annual budget would total $3 million, which would fund 16 staff members (including crisis intervention workers, harm reduction specialists and paramedics), a separate call center, technical assistance, insurance and vehicles. As Molly Kleinman with Bend the Arc Jewish Action of Greater Ann Arbor points out, "$3 million pales in comparison to the $31 million AAPD budget, while getting us closer to a world where we approach people in crisis with care and connection, rather than guns and criminalization."

In the meantime, readers who support CROS' proposed model make their voices heard. They can:

1. Sign CROS' petition: bit.ly/CROSpetition
2. Share with CROS why an unarmed, non-police response program is important to them, and when (that is, in what sorts of situations) they might call the separate number: bit.ly/sharewithCROS

Readers can also head to bit.ly/CRO-Stakeaction to find more ways to show their support. (All bit.ly links in this article are case sensitive.)

A call for LGBT prioritization in US refugee admissions and resettlement policy

SEAN ERRINWRIGHT
Groundcover contributor

Trigger warning: sexual violence, homophobia, transphobia

Evans first fell in love seven years ago, when he was 15. In his own words:

"His name was Nosa. ... we got caught ... (my mother) had two men tie me up ... on the floor. And there, she hit me and left a mark on my stomach with a razor blade. She took a stick and broke it on me, and she kicked me. Now I have scars on my stomach. My mom did that. She put a knife in the fire and burned my stomach. I was screaming. She kept doing it. After that, she said I should get out, I'm not her son anymore. She doesn't want to see me, doesn't have anything to do with me. She is no longer my mother. I almost died."

Evans comes from a Christian Pentecostal family in the city of Benin, Nigeria. "I was bleeding, I was in pain," Evans continues. "I had bruises all over my body, but I was afraid to go to the hospital because I didn't want anyone to know what had happened. So, I went to the Ring Road area in Benin and slept on the sidewalk."

Evans slept in the street for four days.

Several years later, on September 19, 2019, Evan and his boyfriend Charles started making love. ISIL published pictures they took while a young gay man, tied to a chair, was thrown off a building to his death. More pictures were circulated of a gay man bleeding to death after an ISIL stoning.

Someone cut him in the face with a knife; Evans now has a wide and shiny scar that curves from his left ear to his jaw from that.

Eventually, Evans was able to get away from the mob and hide, bleeding all over his face and body. Days later he heard the mob had beaten Charles to death.

The Nigerian police response was to send out a wanted poster of Evans all around the country.

Today, Evans lives in a refugee community in Serres, Greece, where he still does not feel safe, living in fear of disclosing his sexual identity to anyone. To learn about Evans' whole refugee story, go to <https://www.arrowsmith-press.com/lgbtq-refugees>.

Let me also tell you about Benjamin, from Ghana, whose brother with AIDS was killed by poisoning, and who fled for his life when he started having AIDS symptoms.

Let me also talk about Karolina, a trans woman living with HIV. Karolina fled to the U.S. to escape the health-care discrimination she faced in her home country of Mexico — just for not fitting into that culture's traditional gender norms.

And then there are the Kyrgyz LGBT individuals who face so much discrimination in the workplace that they have to turn to sex work just to survive in Kyrgyzstan.

These are but a few examples of the many thousands of LGBT individuals who face the possibility of death and discrimination daily just for loving someone of the same sex.

And the violence they face daily is incomprehensible for many of us Americans. There are vigilante beatings, executions and torture — such as what Evans experienced — in Uganda, South Africa, Kenya, Liberia, Ghana, Cameroon and Senegal. Governments in these countries either turn a blind eye or are complicit in the human rights violations of their LGBT citizens.

It is legal to kill LGBT people by stoning in Afghanistan, Brunei, Iran, Iraq, Mauritania, Nigeria, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen. Islamist militias murder LGBT Iraqis and Syrians, with ISIL (Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant) publicly announcing they killed 39 sodomy offenders.

We can help them.

When LGBT refugees are prioritized in immigration, they get the psychiatric care they need much more swiftly and urgently than they otherwise would.

In a world where we are one of a small number of countries willing and able to protect LGBT persons, we need to extend our arms out to the highly vulnerable, very traumatized LGBT refugees.

As we know, a country can give priority to one refugee over another. When there is a non-LGBT refugee and an LGBT refugee, when the country flexes its coercive power to admit only one of the two, that is when LBGT prioritization can come into play.

There are examples of precedence for this prioritization. In 1948, the UN's Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 14, stated: "Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution."

In 1951, the UN Convention on Refugees stated in its very first Article: "A refugee is a person outside their country who has a well-founded fear of persecution owing to their ... membership of a particular social group."

To help us figure out whether LGBT persons fall under the category of "a particular social group," look back to 1994. At that time, Attorney General Janet Reno released Order 185-94, which stated the following:

"An individual who has been identified as homosexual and persecuted by his or her government for that reason alone may be eligible for relief under the refugee laws on the basis of persecution because of membership in a social group."

Furthermore, in 2004, 2011, and 2012, the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees (UNHCR) and the Council of the European Union published documents wherein they recognized the LGBT community as a social group.

This recognition acknowledged that their persecution is grounds for asylum. Meanwhile, closer to home: in 1990, the U.S. lawfully decreed "homosexuals" as a qualified refugee group.

In 2007, U.S. refugee law recognized transgender identity as a basis of asylum, accepting trans people as being collectively a social group.

In 2015 the Obama administration took the first steps toward prioritizing LGBT refugees. Due to ISIL's horrific treatment of LGBT Syrians, Obama made LGBT Syrians, as a group, a priority for asylum.

Just a few years ago, in 2017, The Ninth Circuit Court recognized that LGBT individuals, persecuted by their family and neighbors due to their sexual orientation, had the right to claim that persecution as grounds for asylum.

We have over 70 years of historical groundwork paving the way for us to prioritize LGBT refugees in the U.S. refugee resettlement process. A refugee policy that includes the prioritization of LGBT refugees will make the difference in many thousands of refugees' lives, refugees who have shown up at our borders after experiencing truly unimaginable and inconceivable torment and agony simply because of who they love.

Today, contact your Congressional representatives to let them know that you want to make ending LGBT refugee anguish a priority. Tell them that you demand a reform in our Refugee Admissions and Resettlement policies that prioritizes LGBT refugees so that we can become a global leader in refugee human rights.

through a complicated patchwork of social services, such as housing insecurity. In Washtenaw County, like most metropolitan areas, social services are a motley mix of governmental (city, county or state), private, religious and/or community-based operations. They all have different capacities to provide aid, and therefore different requirements to access it. By design HAWC navigates this confusing reality for those in urgent need of services.

That is, if there are resources and services to be connected to on the other side.

Besides SOS Community Services' one family shelter space (typically reserved for only large families), the only family shelter in the county is Alpha House. With only six rooms with four beds each, their waitlist is eight months long. According to Executive Director Ellen Schulmeister, Alpha House is in the early phases of determining feasibility for a campaign to increase capacity, but has not yet come to a conclusion on whether to proceed.

When all HAWC offered to Anna was the fact that the Alpha House family shelter was not available, she started calling around herself. "It's like grasping at straws. You call one place, and they say they can't offer what you need. They refer you somewhere else, and they say the same thing."

Elise is a pregnant mother experiencing homelessness. She, her partner and son moved here from Kentucky and all the money they brought with them was stolen through a housing scam.

They called HAWC four days in a row, and never received a call back. On the fifth day, after being connected to multiple advocates, she got an appointment for an intake for her and her family. Ten minutes before the meeting that was scheduled in the middle of the work day, Elise stepped off the floor of her restaurant management job to take the call. After 70 minutes on hold, HAWC answered and told her they would call back. When they did call back, Elise was back working and had to take off more time, to the frustration of her supervisor.

"They never follow through on anything, ever!" Elise said.

As both Anna and Elise's experiences demonstrate, it often requires tremendous persistence to reach anyone at HAWC — something that may be difficult for those experiencing homelessness. Those who have experienced successful outcomes with HAWC advise calling every day, every 15 minutes, or simply "as often as you possibly can." It is problematic that the only source for accessing shelter or rehousing is not immediately accessible itself. (A call to the emergency access line, 211, indicated that the only thing responders tell people facing homelessness to do is contact HAWC.)

When no shelter beds are available, the last option for shelter is receiving a hotel voucher. HAWC funds hotel vouchers for families with specific needs. A local nonprofit also administers hotel stay funds, and while the exact amount was difficult to ascertain, it was more than $25,000 in 2021.

As more families need to stay in hotel rooms for longer periods of time to compensate for the lack of shelter beds, one repercussion may be an increase in damage to rooms and therefore cost of stay. There is also the risk of kids getting needlessly traumatized, possibly causing lifetime deleterious effects on top of the extra instability of weeks or months in tiny hotel rooms.

Washtenaw Camp Outreach has been funding hotel stays for individuals and families with crowd-sourced funds. In the past month alone, they have sheltered over 20 individuals and three families, spending over $3,000.

Anna was connected with Washtenaw Camp Outreach by Sheri Wunder at the Daytime Warming Center. They were able to purchase a week at a hotel for her and her daughter, but eventually she had to stay at MISSION's Purple House emergency winter shelter while her daughter stayed with the baby's grandmother. She had to be separated from her daughter just to access shelter.

Anna asked, "What is there to do?" knowing none of us knew the answer, except to expose the gaps in the system. "I need three times my income to get a place. Rooms are cheaper. But even if you have the money, they don't want you if you have a child or a pet."

Elise experienced a similar decision: separate her family, or be denied shelter. Elise shared that she was advised to place her 17-year-old son in a youth center so that she and her partner could formally be clients at the Delonis Center — the adult homeless shelter — and be put on a list for a housing voucher. "When you are put in that situation, on top of the pregnancy ... I can't describe anything more stressful."

The system needs to be more nimble and more in touch with the families that it serves. What goes hand-in-hand with affecting this outcome is transparency — across agencies and with the public — on specific community needs and the ability to meet those needs: What is the total number of sheltered nights currently being provided to families? How many children are being sheltered? How long are the hotel stays? How many nights in a hotel before they go into a shelter? Do they go directly into housing or are they diverted elsewhere? What is the average length of time families are without housing?

Washtenaw County shelters should return to at least the number of beds available to families a year ago. Sleeping in a hotel should count as homelessness, especially if the hotel or motel is paid for by a community organization. Though there is a large hotel-stay program that targets children enrolled in Ann Arbor public schools, that should not be a qualification for accessing life-saving services. Emergency hotlines need to be more responsive than community-run Facebook pages.

Addressing these needs requires fixing a broken system. The finger often points upward to lack of federal funding. But on all levels (city, county, state and federal), funding for people experiencing homelessness is marginalized and as a result organizations are not able to do what's necessary — staff burns out, infrastructure deteriorates. As more and more money is coming in for pandemic relief, the well-being of families must be a priority and barriers to getting relief to them must be lowered. And we need to start a community conversation about this.

Groundcover Vendor Code

Groundcover vendors, especially vendors who have been suspended or terminated.

While Groundcover is a non-profit, and paper vendors are self-employed contractors, we still have expectations of how vendors should conduct themselves while selling and representing the paper.

The following is our Vendor Code of Conduct, which every vendor reads and signs before receiving a badge and papers. We request that if you discover a vendor violating any tenets of the Code, please contact us and provide as many details as possible. Our paper and our vendors should be positively impacting our County.

• Groundcover will be distributed for a voluntary donation. I agree not to ask for more than the cover price or solicit donations by any other means.

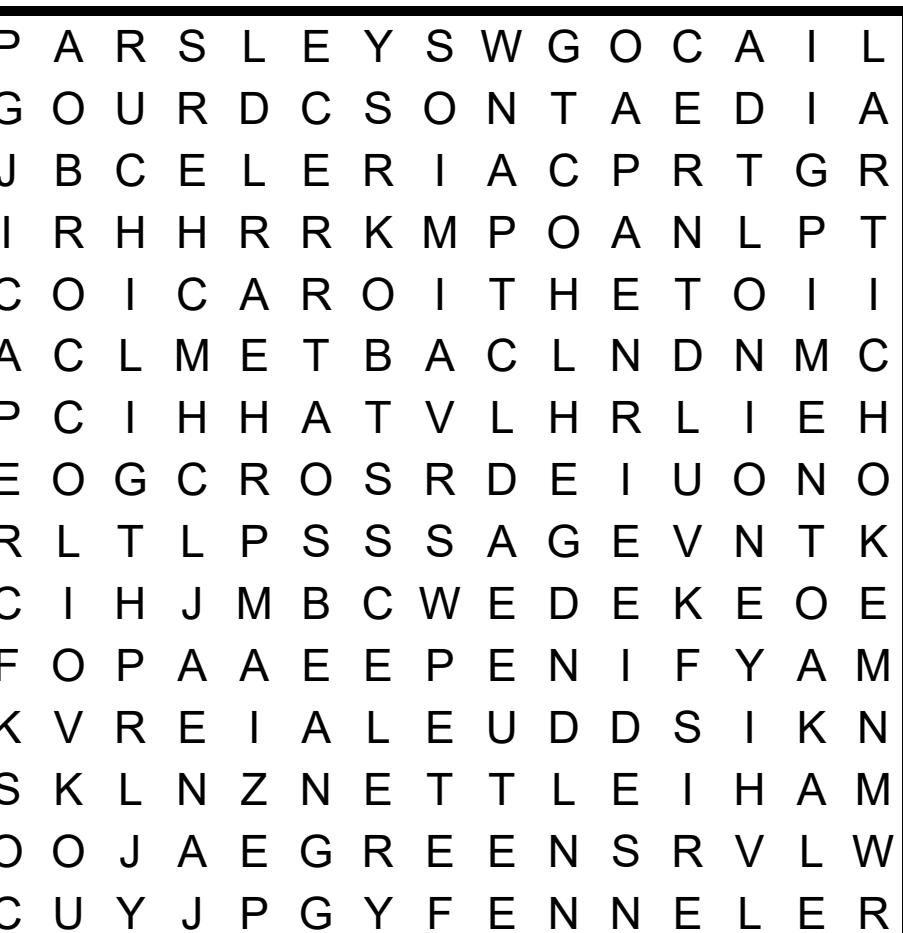

• When selling Groundcover, I will always have the current biweekly issue of Groundcover available for customer purchase.

• I agree not to sell additional goods or products when selling the paper or to panhandle, including panhandling with only one paper or selling past monthly issues.

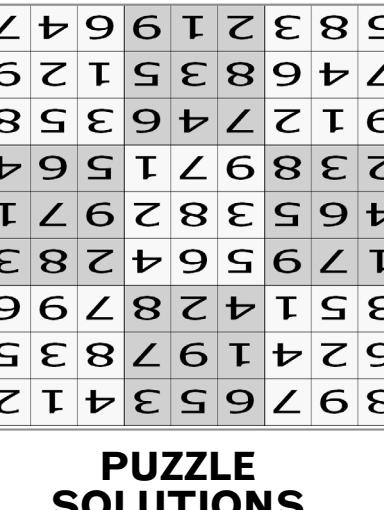

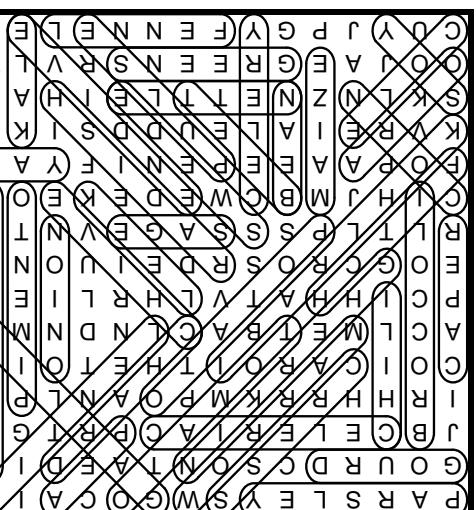

• I understand that Groundcover strives to be a paper that covers topics of homelessness and poverty while providing sources of income for the homeless. I will try to help in this effort and spread the word.

If you would like to report a violation of the Vendor Code please email contact@groundcovernews.com or fill out the contact form on our website.

Ballin' on a budget: Delicious Italian* pasta situation

CHRIS FIELDS
Groundcover contributor

This meal is great for many reasons. It will knock your socks off and taste like you spent a million dollars at your local Italian establishment. If you're in a hurry, you can pull it together in less than 30 minutes (especially if you already have some leftover protein in the fridge). Perhaps most importantly, it is highly customizable. Nearly all of the ingredients except the olive oil, garlic and pasta are optional. You can do whatever you want with this recipe because you are in charge. In this sense, it is not a recipe so much as it is a technique. It will be the perfect meal to impress a special someone in your life. It may even change the trajectory of your life.

I would like to give a special shoutout to Chef John from Food Wishes for teaching me everything I know about cooking and for instilling the techniques outlined in this recipe. I love you Chef John.

Ingredients:

2 to 8 oz of your favorite pasta
2 to 10 cloves of garlic
Enough olive oil to cover the bottom of the pan
Salt and/or pepper to taste
A dash of red pepper flakes
2 to 4 glugs of cheap white wine. Not cooking wine
4 to 8 oz of a protein of your choice (shrimp, chicken, tofu, etc.)
Juice from half to one whole lemon + zest
Small handful of basil and/or Italian parsley, coarsely chopped
Coarsely chopped mushrooms and onions, as many as you want, if you dare
Hard cheese of your choice (Pecorino or Parmesan works well), as much as you want, grated
A hearty knob of butter, or 3 glugs of heavy cream

**This is not an authentic Italian recipe. Many Italian chefs would scoff at the amount of flavors in this recipe. That's okay, you're cooking this for you. Not them.*

You may notice that this "recipe" is very bad at telling you exactly which and how much of an ingredient to use. This is intentional. Rather than follow a rigid set of instructions, the purpose of this ambiguity is to get you in the kitchen experimenting with flavors and ingredients until you can decide what you like for yourself. This is how you learn to cook, rather than simply follow directions.

Directions:

1. Prepare your mise en place (French for "get all your ingredients prepped and portioned because it's going to come together fast"). Chop your vegetables, juice and zest your lemon, and portion your proteins/pasta/wine/etc.
2. All of the vegetables should be chopped however you please and the garlic should be thinly sliced, not minced.
3. Cook your protein if you are using any. This meal is best suited for a light protein such as chicken or seafood (Aldi's has cheap shrimp), but you are the boss of your sauce so cook whatever you like to eat.

4. If you are cooking a land animal, season with salt and pepper to taste. Cover pan with a bit of oil and heat over medium high heat. Once hot, sear your protein and flip after a few minutes. Turn heat down to medium. Once cooked through, remove from pan

5. Pour a small amount of olive oil in the pan and sauté onions and mushrooms if you are using any. Cook at least until soft and slightly browned.

6. Add chopped garlic and pepper flakes, continue to cook over medium low heat until just golden. Be careful to not take the garlic too far, it is better to undercook it than overcook.

7. Pour in your white wine (chicken stock works too, or both) to stop the garlic cooking process and scrape the delicious browned bits from the bottom of the pan. This is called deglazing. It will make you look very fancy. Make sure your date is watching if you have one. The delicious browned flavor bits stuck to the pan are called fond.

8. Cook to reduce the liquid by 2/3 while stirring occasionally.

9. At this point you should boil your pasta in a separate pot. Remember to salt your water and strain the pasta when it is al dente, or just shy of being tender. Reserve a cup or two of the pasta water and set the pasta aside.

10. Add in your lemon juice and reduce just a bit further. Taste the sauce that is forming in your pan and adjust however you think is necessary. Add some salt, maybe some pepper, whatever you think it needs. Trust your intuition. This is you cooking.

11. Add the pasta water and stir your sauce until everything is nicely combined and emulsified. If you are using heavy cream, add this instead of pasta water and reduce until sauce slightly thickens.

12. Add your pasta, cheese and protein then toss until everything in the pan gets to know each other. Heat over low heat until the sauce is your preferred consistency.

13. Finally, stir in your preferred herbs, lemon zest, and a knob of butter (if using instead of cream). Taste once more and adjust accordingly. Train your tongue. Perhaps some more salt? Maybe a squeeze of lemon? A dash of cayenne?

Plate your delicious Italian pasta situation and marvel in what you've created. You did this. Great job. You will never go to Olive Garden again. You've also impressed whomever you are sharing this meal with. Maybe you're eating alone? That's okay, you did this for you because you deserve it.
